Wasatch studies dog problems

By SONNI SCHWINN
Heber City Correspondent

HEBER CITY — Responding to complaints that dogs are destroying livestock, the Wasatch County Commissioners said they would try to find a way to enforce the leash laws.

Three dogs were killed, one was impounded, and two others escaped, after being discovered attacking sheep in Heber City last week, reported Dan Clark, Heber City animal control officer. He said the dogs were stopped before they had done much serious damage to the sheep.

One problem is that there is no animal control officer in the county. Although deputies respond immediately to complaints when dogs get into livestock, there aren't enough of them to spend a lot of time investigating and patrolling for loose dogs, Sheriff Edd Thacker pointed out. In addition, he said his department doesn't have the proper equipment or the training to handle the problem. Clark helps with the county animal control problems but is kept busy with Heber's own dog problems, Thacker said.

Clark explained, "Right now is the worst time of the year. The biggest problem is that everything is having their young right now. Sheep are lambing, cows are calving, and the deer are down low. The young can't get away from (the dogs)," he said.

He said house pets, not stray dogs, cause the problems. He said that even includes small dogs because they start to yap and draw the attention of bigger ones.

"The sheep will run from them and they make a game of it. It might be the most gentle little critter in the world, but when it gets chasing something, it reverts back to its ancestry. Once he gets started, he'll go back," he said.

Dan Tucker, a sheep owner, told the commission about many incidents in which dogs have killed or seriously injured sheep. He said he had killed as many as six dogs at a time in his sheep. He said he has tried to protect his animals with chain link fencing, but that a dog had been seen leaping a five-foot fence from a standstill and destroyed a lot of sheep before he was killed.
